HIDDEN TREASURES.

The Indian Tradition of the Shohola Glen, Pa.

A Cave in Which Untold Mineral Wealth Is Said to Be Concealed-The Highly Sensational Stories Related by Lan "Old Settler."

[Shohola Glenn (Pa.) Cor. N. Y. Times.]

"If I could find the entrance to a cave that all the old residents of this part of the Delaware valley firmly believe lies in under the mountain somewhere between the foot and head of Shohola Glen, I wouldn't ask to be Jay Gould's heir," said Valentine Hipsman, supervisor, and for forty years a resident of Shohola township, Pike County. "According to the story that has come down from time without date that cave must be a treasure house of unheard-of richness. We have found many prominent openings in the rocky ledges that tower above the creek on both sides of the glen for a mile or more, but they lead but a short distance into the mountain. According to the legend the great treasure cave is one that opens out into the subterranean depths, and has many chambers and gal-leries. It extends from the Shohola Glen clear through to Panther brook, over half a mile, in a northerly direction. The Indians who lived hereabout a century and more ago, or some of them, knew the secret of the cave, and the stories told by the first white settlers on this frontier, and which have been handed down from generation to generation of their descendants, about bullets and arrowheads made of silver, which were frequently used by the Indians in their battles and raids on the settlements, are accepted as Gospel truth by many of those descendants now living in the valley.

"The silver used in making these bullets and weapons came from the great cave in Shohola Gien, the entrance to which has been anxiously sought many times since the Indians were driven from the valley, not only by white people, but by descend-ants of the Indians themselves. At least it is generally presumed that the Indians who have appeared from time to time at and about Shohola, up to within nine years ago, numbers of whom have only been discovered in the vicinity by accident, were secretly searching for the legendary cave. A well-marked Indian path may be seen today leading through the woods parallel with the Delaware river, and crossing the Shohola creek at the entrance of the glen, within a quarter of a mile of the Erie railway track. I have followed it for miles, and as the inhabitants of the neighborhood never use it, it must have been trodden more frequently of late years by stealthy descendants of the original people than any of us hereabout have any idea of. The trail certainly would have been entirely obliterated by this time if such had not been the case. When I first came to Shohola the path was very plain. It led right up the face of the mountain, and in following it we were obliged to construct a ladder to surmount the rocks at one point, an obstacle it was evident the Indians had easily overcome by the aid of roots and overhanging branches. The trail can be followed to-day from the Lacka-waxen river, over the Delaware highlands, in this county, to the Neversink river, or 4000 the old 'Minisink country,' below Port Jervis. The path shows the most evidences of comparatively recent use where it approaches Shohola Glen.

"I have known of Indians visiting this vicinity twice within the past decade. My three children were returning from school one day through the old Lackawaxen stage road on the hill back of the glen, when they suddenly came upon three Indians standing in the road. There were two men and a squaw, and the two were in full Indian garb, as the children had seen them in pictures. The children stopped in alarm, but the moment the Indians saw them one of the men uttered a cry and the three dodged into the brush at the roadside and disappeared like magic.

"About five years ago a tall, straight, dark-complexioned man, queerly dressed, but wearing a stovepipe hat, called at my house-I was keeping a tavern here thenand asked for something to eat. I thought Size Reward. The county commissioners of Sedgwick pay for his meal I took his order. He The county commissioners of Sedgwick county, Kansas, hereby offer a reward of S800 for the arrest and conviction of the S800 for the arrest and conviction of the murdered on the night of Janutary 18th, 1889. By order of the beard of county commissioners.

dS-81. In thought be had a tolerable good appetite, but told my wife to cook them. He are the meal, paid for it, and went out. I saw him walk down the road leading to the glen, and at the same time noticed that the county commissioners. train we called No. 6 on the Erie had just pulled out from the station. I thought no more about the strange man, but an hour or so later my wife casually remarked that the man was an Indian who had come from Canada, and who had told her while he was eating his breakfast that he was going east on No. 6. As I had seen him going toward the glen and knew he hadn't taken the train, I believed that he was a descendant of the same Indian who had once lived in this region and that he had come here to look up the treasure cave. I rushed out and followed in the direction he had gone, but lost track of him.

"By the way, the story told by the Indian at Lackawaxen was a curious one. He says that an ancestor of his was in the buttle of Minisink, under Brant, the famous Indian chief. That battle was fought in 1779, three miles up the river from here, on the New York State side. Although the roof. Indians were successful in the battle this valley were numbered. He was one of a side nests that are simple mud saucers, few who knew of the existence of a cave in nests that are built in the old-fashioned bot-Shohola Glen. After the battle he followed the old Indian trail to the gien, entered the cave at that side, walled the entrance up from within, then passed through to Pan ther brook, came out of the cave at that side and walled up the entrance there. This was to destroy all possibility of the white settlers discovering the cave and the wealth of mineral it contained. This thoughtful warrior subsequently went to Canada, where all the Indians went when they were driven from this and adjacent valleys. He died shortly afterward, and only left meager directions to his family as to the finding of the hidden cave. In course of time all traces of the entrances have been destroved, and if the cave, with its legendary mineral wealth, ever existed, it will proba bly remain forever hidden. Almost every year, though, the glen has many visitors who spend a great deal of time in close in spection of the rocks and ledges between the mouth of the glen and the narrow gorge at its head. They don't say much, but I am not the only one who keeps an eye on them, for they are looking for the cave, and we want to be there when it is found."

Bad with Ecrema. Heir all gone: Scalp Covered with Eruptions. Thought His Bair would never Grow. Cured by Cutteura Remedies. Hair Spien-did and not a Pimple on Him.

I cannot say enough in praise of the CUTICURA REMERIES. My boy, when one year of age, was so had with eccemathat he lost all of his hair. His scalp was so covered with eruptions, which the doctor said was scald head, and that his hair would never grow again. Despairing of a cure from physicians, I began the use of the CUTICURA REMEMBERS and, I am happy to say, with the most perfect success. His hair is now spiendid, and there is not pimple on him, I recommend the CUTICURA REMEDITES to mothers as the most speedy, economical, and sure cure for all skin diseases of infants and children, and feet that every mother who has an afflicted child will thank me for so doling.

JOHN HUME.

The Youngest Private Secretary in Washington.

The youngest private secretary in any of the departments at Washington is John Hume, a Wisconsin boy, nineteen years old. He was born at Chilton, in the land of the Winnebagoes, and was brought up on venison and cranberries, two of the leading staples of that section of the State. Young as he is, he and his brother own and edit the Chilton Times, a paper founded by their father, and one of the brightest and strongest local papers in the Badger State. Mr. Hume's father was a Democratic politician of prominence. Two years ago, desiring to see more of life, "Johnny" Hume went to Washington and took a clerkship in the House of Representatives.

Keeping his eyes and ears open he became a good deal wiser and when Colonel Vilas laid down the post-office portfolio to become Secretary of the Interior he could think of nobody better able to assist him as private secretary than Hume, so he ap-

Birds are often said to possess instinct, as distinguished from intelligence, by which is meant, apparently, that such knowledge as they have is inherited, not acquired. "A bird always builds its nest in one way," it is said, but few statements could be less exact.

Our common cliff swallows, known also as the cave swallow and the "Republican," formerly built against the face of a cliff, and as a protection against the weather, the nest, instead of being open at the top, was bottle-shaped, the entrance being through a kind of neck at the side. Now that the country has become populous, how-ever, this swallow has taken to nesting under the eaves of barns, where It is shielded from rain by the overhanging

A Pennsylvania newspaper lately repor ed a very clever piece of work by a pair of these same cave swallows. They had built a nest in the old style under the caves of a barn, and when it was done an English sparrow took possession.

The swallows made frantic efforts to dis todge the intruder, but could not drive her out. Then they went deliberately to work and plastered up the neck of the bottle with mud, burying the sparrow alive, after which they built another nest close by and occupied it . s if nothing had happened .-Youth's Companion.

A bet had been made between the Broom and the Mop that each could tell the biggest lie of any thing in the house. But when G. A. S. Meter said to them one morning, after the return of the household: "I have not registered a single foot of gas not burned this summer." each threw up his hands and
